Hello! Have you ever thought about the difference between British and American variants of the English language? It's very interesting actually. The same phrases can sound differently in America and Great Britain. One more interesting thing is an accent. As a rule American English is not so clear and there is much slang in it. In England people speak very clear and they don't use slang that much.

I found some phrases for you. They mean the same, but British and American people would say them in different ways. Here they are:

It's interesting, isn't it? But sometimes people who start to learn English can get confused, especially with the phrase «I have.../I have got...» Because «I have got» it's actually the present perfect tense of the sentence «I get» If you're confused, I'd advise you to forget about «I have got» speak just «I have» Besides, it's easier.

And what English do you prefer? Do you like American slang, their accent? As for me, I like that American people get many phrases shorter. They're lazy. But it's good for spoken English I think.

Keep learning English and take care!
